

10 Steps for Getting to Best-Fit Type

Discovering your MBTI® type isn't about permanently assigning four letters to yourself, like putting a tattoo on your forehead. Instead, it's about learning something about yourself and how you take in information and make decisions. To do that, you need to figure out which four-letter type is the best fit for you. Here are some steps I recommend to help a client get to her best-fit type.

Have your client take the MBTI® Form Ω assessment. This will enable you to generate both a Step II^m report and a Step IIm report. The Step II facets often add insight into why someone might not identify with her reported results.

As you begin your feedback session, ask your client what her mind-set was when she was answering the questions on the assessment. This can help identify influences that might have affected her results.

Help your client find her two-page type description in the Introduction to Myers-Briggs® Type booklet. Ask her to highlight in one color everything she agrees with on those pages and in another color everything she disagrees with.

Then ask her to do the same thing with any other type that might be her best-fit type. For example, if the client reported INFP but isn't sure if she prefers Thinking or Feeling, have her look at both INFP and INTP.

Ask your client to think back as far as she can remember, to a time before she was influenced by family and friends, and try to answer the question, "What was my preference then, before I had all those roles and expectations?"

Encourage your client to explore this idea with her parents or someone else who knew her well when she was younger to provide ideas. The point is to get a better understanding of the preference your client was born with.

Encourage your client to ask people she trusts and knows well for additional input. Of course, the client is always the final decision maker throughout this process.

Ask your client to give you examples of when she uses each side of a preference pair. Listen for phrases such as "I have to..." Typically, things we have to do are not our preferences.

If your client is unsure about one of her preferences, have her try out both that preference and its opposite and then come back and share her observations with you.

Use the many resources CPP has available to help you and your client find her best-fit type, such as Introduction to Type® Dynamics and Development, In the Grip, and Finding the Fit.

Remember, learning about ourselves is a lifelong process. Some people may never get to their true personality type, and that's okay. I like this quote from Isabel Myers regarding the purpose of the MBTI assessment: "Whatever the circumstances of your life, the understanding of type can make your perceptions clearer, your judgments sounder, and your life closer to your heart's desire."
